Thank You to Our Sponsors

ASME has two groups that are active in the area of management of municipal and hazardous wastes. These groups are the Research Committee on Energy, Environment, and Waste (RCEEW) and the Materials and Energy Recovery Division (MER). Both of these groups work collaboratively to promote proper management practices for the ultimate disposal of solid waste.

MER's goal is to encourage, development and advance the practice of sustainable waste management in the U.S. and abroad; and improve processes for maximum recovery of materials and energy from solid wastes. MER has expertise in waste combustion, energy production from waste materials, air pollution control, recycling and materials recovery. MER maintains liaison with universities, government, industry and environmental groups to disseminate accurate information on sustainable waste management and Materials and Energy Recovery.

RCEEW explores research needs in industrial, municipal, reference method accuracy and precision, solid waste; medical waste; monitoring and control, waste treatment systems; waste management, landfills, recycling, guidelines, solid residue, vitrification, combustion, emissions, , incineration, and other technologies. The committee also interfaces with MER and other organizations including EPA that deal with design, operations, research and regulations concerning industrial, medical and municipal waste management. Both MER and RCEEW both present technical content through technical papers and panel sessions at conferences and webinars.

Boeing has a team of experienced environmental scientists, geologists and engineers dedicated to cleaning up sites that have been affected by past manufacturing activity or waste disposal. Boeing's remediation program is focused on using innovative approaches in cleanup efforts to ensure the protection of human health and the environment, coupled with the use of invaluable input from community members and environmental groups. This, combined with the guidance of leading environmental scientists and federal and state regulatory agencies, has led to great progress in cleaning up remediation sites. Boeing also often collaborates with wildlife and conservation organizations to restore habitat for the benefit of wildlife and the community.
